Incorporating sustainable features into a new dental office for a practicing husband and wife team is not unusual. However, meeting their commitment to a design that blends East Indian and Western architecture added a more personal element to the project. Understanding and valuing a client's desire to combine culture and design required every member of the project team to communicate clearly to ensure the customer's goals were understood and accomplished.

"My husband and I wanted to create one facility for our periodontic and prosthodontic practices. Norwest demonstrated their abilities and expertise, and immediately won our confidence. They listened and brought our vision of an environmentally friendly practice to life – from choosing energy efficient and sustainable products, to reducing our water use and recycling construction debris. They also understood our aesthetic goals of joining East Indian and Western architecture. What impressed us most was the level of communication. We felt they represented integrity, efficiency and professionalism all the way."
